

Table 1.3. CoRS' Norm

Categories of Counterradicalism Readiness	Range of scores
Zero	20 – 35
Low	36 – 50
Medium	51 – 65
High	66 – 80

Table 1.4. CoRS' Reliability

Scale Reliability Statistics
	Cronbach's α	McDonald's ω
Counterradicalism readiness Scale (CoRS)	0.92	0.93

The findings show that the statistical investigation of CoRS' reliability (N=227) is $\alpha = 0.92$ and $\omega = 0.93$ (Table 1.4). CoRS' content-related validity is proved in the process of expert judgements (Step 2 and Step 4). Interrater judgement for behaviour indicators of counterradicalism readiness reaches $\geq 80\%$ agreement. Furthermore, the items' readability test was performed to ensure the qualitative efficacy of each item. This study involved 39 security practitioners and a psychometrician for expert judgement and 227 respondents in pilot study.

The results have found satisfactory 20 items of CoRS with loading factors similar or higher than 0.50. In terms of psychometry properties, CoRS' reliability (N=227) is $\alpha = 0.92$ and $\omega = 0.93$. CoRS shows satisfactory content-related validity with $\geq 80\%$ agreement amongst raters in expert judgement. The study may assist practitioners in evaluating people's willingness and readiness in contributing to terrorism prevention.

CONCLUSION

Before involving community in counternarrative or Counter Violent Extremism (CVE) programmes, it is necessary to assess people's readiness to participate in counterradicalism. This study aimed to develop the Counterradicalism Readiness Scale (CoRS). Using quantitative study design, this work was arranged into six steps: 1) defining counterradicalism readiness and its aspects, 2) identifying behaviour indicators of counterradicalism readiness, 3) making items for scale, 4) performing items' readability test, 5) conducting pilot study, and 6) holding statistical analysis. The counterradicalism readiness is assessed in three psychological domains: cognition, affection, and psychomotor.
